A Passionate Future Nurse

Reagan was a fantastic student throughout school and has always wanted to work in healthcare. His teachers supported him in junior high school, and his headmaster helped in senior high school. He completed his schooling despite his family's lack of money.

After senior high, he worked as a pupil-teacher at two schools for three years to save money for college. His mother also put aside money from her earnings while his father tried to support his sister and other family members.

“My mother and I struggled to save some money for college after obtaining admission to a nursing college. Unfortunately, tragedy struck. My mother suffered a stroke, and her right side was paralyzed. Mercifully, the damage wasn't permanent.” Still, much of their savings went to his mother's treatment.

Despite shaky finances, I started college because I had already paid for my admission fees and bought the needed school supplies. Once in college, I also applied for a student loan which still was not enough to support me. In Ghanaian, parents must have sufficient means to obtain student loans and because my family is poor, they couldn't get the collateral security required by the loan providers.

Luckily, I came across JEQ Foundation scholarship opportunity, I applied and was offered tuition and housing scholarships to enable me to continue my nursing program.
